How was that?" " In the sammer of 1857 I worked to the Tribune, and on Sunday afternoon was sexted, with several others, in the be as sented, with several others, in the large, common room of the reporters. Mr. Greely's little den was roughly partitioned off from one corner, but on Sundays he was never known to be in hefore evening. Taking a large quid of tobacco from ony mouth. I offered to walger the lemonade—that I could hit a knothole in the partition. J. W. Watson, since the author of 'Beautiful Snow'—I've never forgiven him for it—ac-I've never forgiven him for it-ac cepted my proposition. I calculated my distance and fired, making a bull'seye, but before I could demand payment the most fearful profanity was heard within. and in an instant Mr. Greely appeared with the tobacco that had won the lemonade adhering like a plaster to his otherwise immaculate shirt bosom. To the fierce interrogatory. 'Who in the blank! blank ! blank ! threw that tobacco?' I was compelled to enter a plea of guilty. Mr. Watson indorsed my statment that it was a pure accident, but Horace was dressed for a reception and couldn't look at it in that light. He discharged me on the spot."
